P. 2—Leu is not on good terms with the two Rumanian national committees directed by General Radescu and Vishoyano. He has tried to reconcile them and unite them, but in vain. His was a thankless task, especially due to the fact that each of the two factions thinks that it represents the country exclusively. Also, each is prepared, in an exclusive way, to impose itself on the country tomorrow, without regard to the changes which have taken place and all the misery the people have suffered.

No, he is not on excellent terms with those committees, but nevertheless each of them is trying to get him, wishing to be assured of his collaboration, because he is necessary to them. But he wants unity. . . .
